

This issue's feature article follows on from the last issue's piece on "Appreciating Complexity; Creating Simplicity." It describes a lesson I times, letting it burn through the mess in my mind. Suddenly, I knew what I wanted to do.

Out of the mess, a clear, powerful focus emerged. I realized I wanted to build receptivity toward nature into young minds, and receptivity toward their own power. I wanted to help them develop their capacity to create what mattered — in harmony with the systems that sustain all life.

Instantly my life became both simpler and richer.
